

The Wolf Cinema... Cub?

Posted Sun Jan 10, 2010, 6:57 PM ET By Shane Buettner

Wolf Cinema has something for those who can't quite go to the screening room screen sizes supported by its big D-Cinema based projectors. The company was holding private demos showing pre-production samples of a new LED-based projector that will be available later this year. While it's not small, it looks kinda cute next to the company's digital cinema based line. The image was bright and punchy, and loaded with crisp detail on a 106" wide 2.35:1 screen. It didn't hurt that the source material was comprised of clips of serious eye candy like Baraka and the psychedelic Speed Racer. Still, the projector wasn't missing any of it. Final pricing is not yet determined, but is expected to be around $23k. While it already has a model number, Wolf Cinema's John-Paul Lizars mentioned calling it the Cub, and I'm running with that. Consider the start of an online campaign!